

HASHIT

Run No: 1671

Hare: Fuzz

Where: Wagga Wagga Beach

When: 10 September 2007

Last week we turned up at the newly revamped Wagga Wagga beachside, taking a bit of time to admire the work being done there, fortunately without a budgie smuggler in sight.

Some of the hashers were a bit footsore after competing in the Lake to Lagoon but this did not stop the hare Fuzz sending the runners round in circles whilst the walkers went in a straight line, found on home, and walked back again.

Back at the bucket we discovered there wasn't one, with Fuzz claiming he didn't know he was meant to pick up the piss. With the horror of a dry night on our hands, all was not lost with Milo saving the day, having stashed the beer in Gomer's boot.

A welcome back was given to a very vocal, lately missing hasher Boombox, who made a half hearted attempt of drinking from her shiny shoe that she maintained was not new. But the DHOTW went to Bumfluff for his poor effort removing a stone from his shoe at the Lake to Lagoon.

23 needles found in woman's body

An X-ray image of Chinese woman, Luo Cuifen, 29, released by Richland International Hospital, where needles are seen in her body.

September 11, 2007 - 8:58AM

Chinese surgeons will try to remove 23 needles from a woman that doctors believe may have been imbedded under her skin by grandparents trying to kill her so that a baby boy might take her place.

After Luo Cuifen of China saw blood in her urine, doctors found 23 needles in her body. Her grandparents may have inserted the needles to try to kill her as a child because they wanted a boy, a hospital said Sept. 10. The needles - about an inch in length - were discovered by X-ray after Luo Cuifen, 29, went to doctors complaining of blood in her urine. Many of the needles have worked their way into Luo's vital organs including her lungs, liver, bladder and kidneys, making their removal difficult, said Qu Rui, a spokesman for the Richland International Hospital in Yunnan province's capital, Kunming. He said six of the 23 needles, all of them in the woman's abdomen, would be removed Tuesday in the first of several expected operations. "Tomorrow's surgery carries a definite degree of risk," Qu said. According to a hospital news release, Luo has for years suffered from severe depression and anxiety and long-term insomnia, and was completely unable to do any heavy lifting or hard physical labor.

The operation will involve 23 doctors in fields ranging from women's medicine to neurology and including bone specialists and cardiologists, the news release said. Doctors from Canada and the United States will join those from China in the operation. Qu said doctors believe the woman's grandparents may have inserted the needles long ago, hoping she would die and her parents might have a boy in her place. China limits most families to just one child, although rural Chinese may be allowed to have a second if their first is a girl, subject to the payment of fines.

It wasn't clear whether further investigations into the case were planned, with media reports saying Luo's grandparents had already died. In many parts of China, baby boys are still heavily favored over girls because they are bound by tradition to support their parents in their old age, and because they carry on the family name. Infanticide and abortions of female fetuses have created a skewed ratio between the genders, with 119 boys reported born for every 100 girls, according to official figures. By comparison, the ratio in industrialised countries between 104 and 107 boys for every 100 girls.
